

For her twenty-fifth birthday, a family legacy is passed on to small town pastry chef Marissa Maitland as a Kundigerin, which means she has come into secret psychic power. She will know things about people at the brush of a hand, and use this to help themâ€”but she cannot talk about being Kundigerin without suffering pain. Named executor of his grandmotherâ€™s estate, Wolf Harper must find something called a â€œKundigerinâ€• before he can sell the place. If he could sell his remaining family too, he would. Keeping the family business afloat is his priority, in spite of his uncleâ€™s bad management putting them in the red. Wolf runs into Marissaâ€”literally, at an icy intersectionâ€”and is enchanted by her beauty. One bite of her baked goods bewitches him and enflames a passion Marissa shares. But Marissa blurts long-buried details about the car accident that killed his parents, and knows far too much about the problems at Harper Electronics, neither of which she will explain. Should he be afraid of her?
